

10/10/1988

The following issues of Studies in Management are sent to me for the quarter 1988

1. Management - Management

1. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.

2. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.

3. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.

4. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.

5. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.

6. Management is a social scientific discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences. It is a discipline in the sense that it is a body of knowledge that is subject to the same standards of research and theory as other social sciences.